Public Comment

My name is David St. Amant. I am a student at LCC with a disability. I speak slowly and will need an accommodation of more than 5 minutes for my remarks. Although the college is making small changes to adapt to more students with disabilities, it needs to do more changes to help its students to succeed.

LCC should have procedures in place that make being a student with a disability less difficult. For example, The Office of Disabilities counselors work with you to identify individual needs and sign the appropriate form for student accommodations. The student hands the instructors the pink slip of accommodations. The instructor seems to be at a loss as to what to do with the information. In fact, in general the instructors do not understand their responsibilities under the Americans with Disabilities Act. There is a void between the counselor’s recommendations and the instructors understanding of them. The instructors seem to be unaware of the services that are available, such as the use of a quiet room for test taking. Also, the instructors aren’t quite sure how to use reader services. The instructors fear giving accommodations may be perceived as an unfair advantage.

Students with disabilities feel powerless, afraid to state their needs. The students may not have the confidence or ability to speak for themselves. They become frustrated and often give up on their education goal.

I want the LCC Board of Trustee to assure the disability community that all instructors are trained in both responsibilities to provide accommodations for students with disabilities and to assure that every instructor is familiar with the services of the Office of Disability Support Service.
